Gelatine-induced expression of inducible heat shock genes in fibroblast-like rat liver cells. The heat shock response of rat liver cells was studied in the primary culture system. An evident heat shock response was observed in these cells. The cells began to increase in size, protein synthesis increased, and then the specific protein synthesis rate increased.

In the course of the acquisition of the heat shock response, the inducibility to heat shock increased. Heat induction of inducible heat shock genes HSP70.1, HSP70.2, hspA8 and hsp40 was examined. An increase in the synthesis of the mRNA of these genes was observed in the 1 hr after the cells were heated to 42 degrees C. The message for HSP70.1 mRNA appeared to be mainly synthesized from hspA8 and hsp40
