I'm certainly not the first to discover the potential of AI, and Photoshop Elements is not the first Photoshop program to use AI. In fact, Adobe has been steadily moving towards a more intelligent Photoshop even before the current version. While the much-anticipated architecture for AI in Photoshop was announced in 2015, AI didn't crawl into a communication channel until a year later with the release of Photoshop CC 2017. I had the good fortune to sit down with someone at Adobe who is responsible for the AI functionality within Photoshop to ask him personal questions and how he got into the field. He is Christopher Lyes, a cognitive psychologist with a PhD. Some of his past work on human cognition has included the study of mathematical beauty, colored vision, and the perception of music. As an amateur performing musician, he appreciates elegance and was also the first to study the aesthetics embedded into math and music.

But Christopher never left the field of cognition until 2016 when Adobe hired him to work on the depth of understanding in Photoshop, as the company prepares to launch its debut work of AI, Adobe Sensei. We'll fix that, in three ways. 1. Sew Bike paths 2. Place pallets to keep riders off the road (hey, we can walk on Pallets on Driveways, after all!) 3. Fit seats into bikes, like they do in Asia, where you don't need a helmet because you never ride a bike.

Yes, and it's all mom's fault. For the record, it wasn't, but we'll get to that. For the first point, we're going to create a 30 ft. shoulder bike path, guaranteed to fit you, and don't have to worry about scratches, dirt, mud, or whatever. Concerns you might be concerned about. No, no, we're not making a bike path that's 20 ft.
